

Abstract

The present study tested the might versus morality hypothesis in a member selection public good dilemma. With a member selection simulation task, the study examined whether prosocial and proself persons differ in their preference for might and morality information, both in obtaining the information of others and presenting information of self. The result from self information presentation provided some support to the might versus morality hypothesis.